

If I were to make a peaceful world

Everybody yearns for a better peaceful world. A peaceful world will bring happiness. What a peaceful world means to me is a world without poverty and wars.

First, in my own peaceful world, I would make it my priority to make sure that everyone has a home to live in, so there would be no one that would be living in the streets. In the Philippines where I live, I see many homeless people as I ride in a car along the streets of Manila, and people walking by often ignore them. Sadly, people in Manila are used to this sight so they usually just walk by ignoring the homeless people. It breaks my heart to see people sleeping on the streets and children begging on the roads. In my peaceful world, everyone should have a decent house to live in and not sleep on the streets.

Then I would make institutions to educate people to give to charity and donate useful items. I would also create a special day on November 1st called “Charity Day”. I chose this date because it’s usually when the weather starts getting colder.

Donating blankets, clothes, and other items could help people live more comfortably. In my peaceful world, people will learn to love, give and care for each other.

Next, I would wipe out wars. There would be no more fighting — only peace, kindness and happiness. People would treat each other fairly and live with joy. Nations would come together and work as one for humankind in my peaceful world. Since no one wants to live in fear, I would do my best to remove those threats and make everyone feel safe.

To start making my dream of a peaceful world a reality, I will travel the world when I grow up, speak in front of large audiences, and try to make people listen. I will also create a group called “Fighters for Peace”, and together we will work to convince governments and leaders to make this world — our only home — a peaceful place for everyone.
